QUIZ # 02

1. What early warning signs suggested that the founders of EduVision did not have a well-balanced new-venture team?

Ans. Roles were loosely divided with no clear responsibilities.

- Hassan handled all development alone.
- Maryam was overloaded with marketing, operations and fundraising.
- Sheryar missed deadlines ~~was~~ and wasn't fully committed.

2. How might the founders have identified their skill gap earlier? Which roles were most critical for them to fill based on the case?

Ans. They could have conducted a skill audit early on, compare their capabilities to standard start-up roles and reviewed investor-ready team requirements.

Most critical gaps are:

Operations/Project Management

Product Management

Finance/Business analytics

3. Why is role clarity important in the early stages of a startup? Use examples from the case to support your answer.

Ans. Prevents overload and confusion:

Maryam handled too many functions, slowing progress.

- Enables timely decisions:

Hassan and Maryam disagreed on priorities due to unclear leadership.

- Ensures accountability:

Shehryar missed deadlines because expectations were vague.

4. If you were an investor evaluating EduVision in the early months, would you have funded them? Why or why not?

Ans. No, because:

- The team lacked structure and key competencies.
- Responsibilities were unclear, showing weak execution capability.
- High dependence on one developer and inconsistent commitment from the designer.

5. How did bringing in Amina change the team's performance? What does this reveal about the importance of structure in new-venture teams?

Ans. Impact:

Introduced timelines, task tracking, and role clarity.

Improved coordination, productivity, and accountability.
